You Can Do It Without a Conservatorship!

Some people think a person with a disability needs a conservatorship when they turn 18. But there are ways to address common concerns are easier, cheaper, and less restrictive than conservatorships.

This packet includes information and sample forms to help people with disabilities get support from family or other trusted supporters in medical, educational, and financial decisions without losing their rights.

How can supporters help with medical decisions?

- A person with a disability can sign a HIPAA Release permitting supporters to access her records.
  - “Sharing My Medical Information” is a plain-language release you can use.
- A person can invite anyone they trust to attend any medical appointments.
- A person with a disability can sign a Durable Power of Attorney for Health Care, which identifies supporters authorized to make decisions if she becomes incapacitated.
  - “If I Need Help Making Medical Choices” is a plain-language power of attorney.

How can supporters stay involved in education?

- A person with a disability can sign an authorization permitting supporters to attend IEP meetings and access her educational records.
  - “Sharing School Information” is a plain-language authorization.
- A student can invite anyone to an IEP meeting even without signing any paperwork.

How can supporters help with money management?

- Supporters can become the representative payee for government checks. SSI and other benefits will go directly to the representative payee.
- Supporters can monitor a person’s spending through various tools, including joint bank accounts, autonomic bill pay, or debit cards from companies, like TrueLink, that offer prepaid debit cards that can be customized to protect against scams and fraud.
