[REDACTED] He also went to pray at this mosque prior to leaving for Afghanistan. [REDACTED] would attend whichever mosque was most conveniently located.

[REDACTED] believes that jihad is the sixth pillar of Islam. No one taught this to [REDACTED]. He developed this belief from his personal reading of the Koran. [REDACTED] became more serious about his religious faith in 2001 and began reading the Koran more. [REDACTED] views jihad as a struggle. This can either be a personal struggle against temptation or a violent struggle against those who oppress Muslims. [REDACTED] did see and experience violence from various racist groups [REDACTED] as a group which promotes racial superiority and segregation. [REDACTED] said a mujahadeen was an individual struggling in a holy war.

[REDACTED] never witnessed anyone at a mosque [REDACTED] advocating that Muslims should go to Afghanistan for jihad. [REDACTED] received all his information about Afghanistan from the news media, primarily [REDACTED] never saw Al-Jazeera News Media reports.

[REDACTED] believed all the media reports which he saw showed the Taliban government of Afghanistan in a bad light. [REDACTED] wanted to travel to Afghanistan to fight jihad and see for himself what the Taliban government was like. While in Afghanistan, [REDACTED] saw the Taliban as a good government administrating the country according to Muslim law. [REDACTED] saw woman wearing burkhas which is according to the Koran. [REDACTED] saw women unescorted by a male family member in public. [REDACTED] saw girls in school type uniforms carrying books. [REDACTED] told him these girls were going to school. [REDACTED] also saw Sikhs. When he talked to them, they told him they were treated better in Afghanistan than they were in India. [REDACTED] assumed they were protected by the Taliban because they were paying Jizya. Jizya is a tax mandated by the Koran that all non-Muslims who live in a Muslim controlled country must pay. Paying this tax allows the non-Muslim to practice his/her religion unmolested by the government. [REDACTED] said the Taliban government was a good government.

Synopsis: The purpose of this communication is fourfold: 1) To provide a summary of work-to-date by an FBI deployment team that is processing approximately 1,300 detainees held by Northern Alliance forces in Sheberghan, Afghanistan for fingerprints, photographs, DNA and biographical information; 2) To document the individuals interviewed to date that the team considers most dangerous among the detainees and should be considered for transfer to U.S. custody in Bagram, Afghanistan, and Guantanamo Bay, Cuba; and 3) To document the FBI deployment team's contention that no individual within the detainee population can at this time be considered "safe" to be released and the deployment team will make no such recommendation. 4) To document the FBI team's concern about credible reports that significant numbers of detainees may be released in an Afghan government amnesty around the Eid celebration marking the end of Ramadan (o/a December 4). The FBI team and U.S. Department of State (DOS) political officer in Mazar-E-Sharif believe Afghan government officials should be approached to prevent such an amnesty with respect to Sheberghan detainees, or at a minimum to ensure that the most dangerous among the detainees are not released.

Details: Referenced previous communications laid out an FBI team's deployment to Sheberghan Prison, Afghanistan, to interview and process the 1,300 detainees. The idea of the deployment is to obtain identifying data on all detainees - fingerprints, photographs, DNA and biographical information - for search and posting in FBI databases to include its 43-million electronic print database, the Integrated Automated Fingerprint Identification System (IAFIS), and in National Crime Information Center (NCIC), which is accessible to all U.S. law enforcement, including border security.

The 1,300 detainees will be assigned FBI numbers and maintained in the databases in the same manner as arrest and criminal information, such as felony convictions, so that the detainees can always be identified as enemies of the U.S. and a potential threat. The Sheberghan deployment is one of a number lead by agents with the FBI's Criminal Justice Information Services (CJIS) division, which is the steward of IAFIS and NCIC. The previous deployments to Afghanistan and Pakistan have garnered a fingerprint-based database of 5,000 Al Qaeda fighters and enemies of the U.S.

The database is fingerprint-based because fingerprints are unique identifiers which do not age and cannot be altered or counterfeited. Traditional name and date-of-birth databases have little utility tracking Middle Eastern or Asian individuals, whose names are common, phonetically spelled from different alphabets, and who frequently don't know a date-of-birth. The terrorism investigations conducted since September 11 have also clearly shown that terrorists such as Al Qaeda members are mobile, well-funded, criminally sophisticated and adept at obtaining false identity documents, so fingerprints may be the only way to effectively track and identify them. The 1,300 detainees from Sheberghan are being added to this database, which resides within the IAFIS.

The deployment team is equipped to run as many as three booking stations, and have hired Urdu and Pushtu translators to facilitate interviews, which at minimum generate mandatory biographical information necessary for entering the subject into NCIC. This information includes name, DOB or age, place of birth, height, weight, eye color, hair color, scars and marks and tattoos. Each detainee is also asked a series of questions that are Middle Eastern or Asian identifiers, such as father's name, village of origin and tribal affiliation. About 700 of the detainees are Afghan with Pushtun tribal affiliation, and by custom have only one name. The remaining 600 detainees are primarily Pakistani, with a few Sudanese, Bangladesh and other nationalities.

Each detainee is also asked the following questions: 1) Do you have any knowledge of any threat against the United States or government of Afghanistan? 2) Do you have any knowledge of any terrorist act - past, present or future - against the United States or government of Afghanistan? 3) Do you have any information regarding Al Qaeda? 4) Do you have any information regarding Usama Bin Ladin? 5) Have you traveled to any country outside of Afghanistan?

A series of questions regarding length of time fighting for the Taliban, weapons assignment, battles fought, tactics used, commanders and command structure, and place of capture by the Northern Alliance forces are also asked. Detainees are then asked directly the following questions: 1) Are they enemies of the United States? 2) Would they attack and kill the FBI interviewers if they could? 3) Would they continue Jihad against the U.S. upon release? And 4) Would they be willing to conduct a martyrdom mission? About ten percent of detainees answer affirmatively to this series of questions.

To date, about 800 detainees have been processed by the FBI team, which deployed from the U.S. in early November, when General Abdul Rasheed Dostum, the Special Representative for the North of the Afghan Government who controls Sheberghan prison, indicated he would give access to the detainees. The team consists of a CJIS Supervisory Special Agent and three Evidence Response Team (ERT) Special Agents from the Newark Division of the FBI. A CJIS technician accompanied the team as far as Kabul, and in FBI space in the U.S. Embassy annex installed a computer platform with the latest in fingerprint technology, which converts the fingerprints on a standard FBI fingerprint card to digital information and launches the prints by satellite for search and posting against IAFIS and NCIC.

The team is supported by a U.S. Army Special Forces (SF) team, A Company, First Battalion, 20th SFGA, ODA 2014, based in Mazar-E-Sharif, which provides the liaison contacts with General Dostam that allowed the deployment to occur, provides the contacts for hiring local translators fluent in English, Pushtu and Urdu, and provides security at Sheberghan prison and convoy travel from the General's compound. (S)
A U.S. Army Military Police (MP) team, 972nd Military Police Company, Melrose, Mass, from K-2 base in Karshi-Khanabad, Uzbekistan, has been integrated into the booking process and provides additional security and assistance with collection of identifying information.

The team gathers prints, photos, DNA and biographical information by the following process: Because of extremely primitive conditions at the prison, which lacks power, running water, heat and concrete floors, prints are gathered on a briefcase-sized station with printer's ink and paper FBI cards, two cards per detainee for quality purposes. Each detainee's picture is taken five times with a digital camera on fine quality - full front, right 45 degree, right profile, left 45 degree and left profile. The sequence is based on recommendations from vendors developing emerging facial recognition technologies. The five photos are backed up with two 35 mm photos taken in the traditional law enforcement mugshot sequence: full front and right profile. Two DNA bucal swabs are taken from each detainee, air-dried and placed in evidence envelopes. A short-form interview form based on questions detailed above is completed by agents and translators. The print cards, swabs and interview forms are maintained in a large manilla envelope, and each item as well as digital and 35 mm photos are tagged with a tracking number based on characters: SHER-0000.

~~SECRET~~

b1

The packets, film, CDs containing digital photos, 35 mm film and floppy discs containing all interview write ups and accompanying electronic communications are packaged and sent [redacted] (s) [redacted] from Sheberghan to Kabul. The prints, photos and other information are scanned by the CJIS technician into the remote fingerprint platform, which submits the prints and information by satellite link to CJIS for search and posting against IAFIS and NCIC. The DNA swabs and the hard copies of the prints are sent by post to the FBI Laboratory. The remote submissions of fingerprints and other information involves the following:

- 1) The detainees' prints are searched against the IAFIS fingerprint file of the FBI's 22 most wanted terrorists.
- 2) The detainees' prints are searched against IAFIS files to include the fugitive and criminal history files.
- 3) The detainees' prints are searched against the latent print file containing unidentified crime scene prints from terrorist acts including Tanbomb, Kenbomb, the USS Cole bombing and the World Trade Center attacks.
- 4) The detainees are assigned FBI numbers, which are permanent tracking numbers, and their prints are permanently posted in IAFIS for future searches and comparisons.
- 5) The detainees' photos and biographical information are posted permanently in the NCIC Violent Gang and Terrorist Organization File (VGTOF) for retrieval by any U.S. law enforcement agency making an inquiry.

The remote submission ensures that at the least agents will know before the deployment is completed that no wanted individual is among the 1,300 Sheberghan detainees, will know whether any of the detainees had been arrested in the U.S., and will know that the fingerprints and the photos are of sufficient quality to reside in IAFIS for future searches and comparisons. It is noted that the utility of this database could be critical to border security in coming years, as the U.S. may go to a fingerprint-based visa system.

To agents conducting the interviews in Sheberghan, it became quickly apparent that the detainees had been coached in counter-interrogation. Several detainees, in fact, stated that leaders within the prison had held classes in what to tell the Americans, techniques that fit precisely into what is known of Al Qaeda counter-interrogation techniques taught in Bin Laden camps. The detainees' pre-rehearsed stories, as agreed upon in the classes, admits the obvious, some involvement in the

Taliban and the detainees' surrender Konduz or Irganak. But detainees decline to give or claim they don't remember any specifics of their battles, tactics, command structure or communication structure. Most minimize their involvement, again as they were coached, advising they were conscripted, were only with the Taliban days or a few weeks, and were non-combatants: cooks, drivers and farmers. Many denied even knowing what Al Qaeda or UBL was.

Detainees advised other detainees were debriefing as to the American's questions upon return to their cells, and on their answers. A few detainees further advised that it was widely known inside the prison that a detainee who began cooperating with General Dostum's criminal intelligence officers was murdered on orders of a leader among the detainees. Agents have identified the leader and two of the conspirators, who tortured the victim with electric shocks for about a half-hour before then strangling him. The three openly admit the murder, though they dispute the motive of the victim's cooperation and describe it as a personal grudge. Agents have obtained the local officer's files, which contain a dozen statements of witnesses and participants to the killing, and are having the statements translated to identify other conspirators. Interestingly, the statement of one that has been translated indicates the leader's motivation was the victim had information that would have sent him to Cuba. A letter recovered from the leader makes a remark about fearing transfer to Cuba if more were known of him.

The victim in the killing is described as follows:

The leader and the two conspirators admitting the murder are described as follows:

Agents have begun fast-tracking the booking process as much as possible, and aim to ensure that all identifying information of the remaining 400, to include fingerprints, photographs, DNA and biographical information is gathered by Eides, the Muslim holiday marking the end of the fast of Ramadan. Agents have also begun the tedious process of comparing varying detainee lists, to include the prison's poorly documented, hand-written lists, to ensure every detainee has been processed. Missing some detainees is a real possibility, in that guards have on several occasions brought detainees who already had been processed.

b1 The decision was made to fast-track the booking process because of persistent rumors passed to agents by local officers [REDACTED] that the Afghan government may release all the detainees as a "good will gesture" coinciding with Eides. Agents on the FBI deployment team have been asked whether they could provide lists of detainees who would be "safe" to be released. As stated in the summary of this communication, agents strongly contend that none of the detainees are "safe" to be released and will under no circumstances describe any detainee as anything other than a continuing threat to the U.S., to soldiers and U.S. citizens in the combat theater and to the Government of Afghanistan. (S)

The deployment team agents and two Temporary Duty (TDY) agents based in Kabul have made contact with U.S. military in Bagram about transferring detainees deemed most dangerous into U.S. custody for re-interviewing and possible transfer to Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. Chief among this group is the prison leader who issued the Fatwah resulting in the torture and murder of another detainee, and the conspirators who admit involvement. The agents have further sent electronic communications, referenced above, requesting FBIHQ guidance as to criteria and procedure for effecting transfer into U.S. custody.

General Dostum has indicated to the FBI on-scene supervisor that the U.S. could take custody of any detainee it wants. The SF group that is supporting the deployment has contacted the U.S. Air Force to accomplish an airfield survey of Sheberghan airfield for possible use by C-130s or other Air Force planes for prisoner transport. It is noted the MP team integrated into the booking process is Raven-trained to provide security for such transports.

The deployment team has maintained a running list of individuals who they believe need to be extensively re-interviewed. The list generally falls into three categories: 1) Individuals who openly advise that they are committed Jihadis who want to kill Americans and will do so upon their release. 2) Individuals who agents suspect are prison leaders or possible Al Qaeda members. 3) Individuals who, though they describe themselves as conscripted farmers, have been previously identified in [redacted] FBI communications as Al Qaeda members. (The TDY agents in Kabul are effecting these identifications.) Agents strongly contend these individuals, in addition to their intelligence value, are simply too dangerous to consider releasing. (S)

Agents further have maintained close contact with the criminal intelligence officers, who have worked within the prison for a year. The officers advise that there are about 100 individuals at the prison who they believe are Al Qaeda members or committed Jihadis, in particular among the 600 Pakistanis detained there. Agents have obtained this list, translated it [redacted] (S)
[redacted] The list is attached and made part of this communication, and this (S) EC and the attached agent list also will be [redacted] and by the Kabul agents to military authorities in Bagram.

What follows is identifying data and brief summaries of the deployment team's list of detainees who require re-interview. It is noted in compiling this list that 400 of the Pakistanis have yet to be processed, and that the Pakistanis have to date had higher percentages of individuals committed to continuing, religiously motivated war. The list, which is followed by the intelligence officers list of 100, is as follows:
